(CNN) -- As President Barack Obama prepared to land in Afghanistan, he sounded a defiant note of resolve. "The war in Afghanistan is coming to a responsible end," he said at a news conference aboard Air Force One. On Friday, however, Obama replaced that strong rhetoric with an admission that US forces might have to stay in the country, long past the November elections that he has made clear will be critical. "It is possible that we will have to train and assist the Afghan national security forces for quite a long time," he said. "If we do that, obviously that changes what we do in terms of forces and resources." Should the United States decide to continue to train Afghan security forces, the numbers would go up. In a statement accompanying the president's news conference, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said the administration is considering a "range of missions for US military assistance in Afghanistan beyond the current NATO-led training mission through the end of 2014." Speaking to reporters aboard Air Force One, a senior Obama administration official said that Gates mentioned this possibility during a meeting Thursday with the president. The official said Obama thought Gates
